Excerpt: . . . gentler and more considerate; she, more lenient towards his faults and more earnestly in love with him. The young man smiled as he said: You have such an ex cathedra way of speaking of it, I must conclude that you have given this case your thoughtful attention. May I ask, in a general way, what you think of marriage under circumstances similar to theirs I am not sure that I can give you a very lucid answer. Never having experienced any of the ills of poverty, I am not competent to judge impartially. Speaking individually, I have always congratulated myself on having enough to give a poor man--provided I should accept such a person. Speaking generally, while I would commend prudence to every ones consideration, I would say that love, and love alone, should determine a man or woman in taking that important step. But cannot people control their own heart before they fancy themselves in love asked the young man. I cannot answer for the rest of mankind, she answered, smiling; for myself, I can say the heart is assuredly subservient to my will and judgment. May I add one more question to my catechism he inquired, looking at her as if doubting his right to put the question to her. Certainly. I will reserve the right to answer it or not, she said, with a light laugh. Then, tell me what would you have done if you had been in Mrs. Byrnes...
