Excerpt: .in another; and, when the impossibility of all this being accomplished without loss of caloric from the water, are considered, it will be easy to account for the origin of warm springs. The quantity of some springs is so little affected in dry or in wet seasons, as to afford reasons for inferring that a considerable proportion of the rain which falls and percolates the earth, is consolidated in forming matter, the result of its combination with different substances decomposing the constituent parts of the water. Melted matter, basalt, or other known volcanic products, appear to have burst through the strata, forming immense dykes for a great extent. The vacuity occasioned by contraction after cooling in the interior, may have been the cause of great dislocations in the superior strata, as the melted matter abated in heat. Some openings, even of large size, as well as many small fissures, were filled up by water, carrying in the debris of the adjacent strata, as is found in the coal-measures; or, they now remain the passages of volumes of water effecting important consequences: for, if passages do exist, it is probable that water would not be quiescent in them; and that, in some places, they may be enlarging the openings by their action, and in others, filling them up. The consequences upon the density of the strata, arising from compression referrible to the superincumbent mass, are not uniform; for, if thick beds of sand or other rock...
